

Mystery Case

Bob's Account

I must categorically state that I had nothing to do with the disappearance of any candy. On that very morning, I was entirely absorbed in my work in the adjacent office, organizing files and preparing for an important presentation. It's true I briefly passed by the break room—purely by chance—while retrieving a document that needed immediate attention. However, my only observation was the mild commotion among my colleagues, nothing more.

Frankly, I found it odd that the incident was blown out of proportion over a single candy. I even noted Joe's somewhat overzealous reaction to the situation. It wouldn't surprise me if, in an effort to create a stir or shift blame, someone might have exaggerated details to mask their own missteps. I maintain that I saw no one acting out of character at that moment, and my brief presence in the corridor was completely incidental. Any suggestion that I had a hand in this petty theft is nothing more than an unfortunate misinterpretation of innocent actions. The truth is far less scandalous than the tale being spun by others.
